The River Loire and its tributaries string together a diverse mix of vines and vineyards. At the mouth of the river, east of Paimboeuf, sea and land infiltrate each other's element in the curling creeks and salt marshes that bound the western perimeter of the Muscadet appellation.

The simple grape variety is a super-abundant source of light white wine and seems far from ordinary when paired with the local moules, oysters and sunshine.

The most evocative of the Loire's appellations are Sancerre and Pouilly-Fumé and Quincy. A little Pinot Noir has found its way into these vineyards, delicately re-emerging as rosé, but their reputation is largely built on mineral, blackcurrant-scented Sauvignon Blanc. Despite competition from New Zealand, Sancerre and Pouilly-Fumé have maintained their varietal prominence, principally because the growers are still prepared to sacrifice a little flavour in order to boost Sauvignon's tactile thrill.

ITALY

Viewed through delicatessens and markets, Italy seems the most generously provisioned country in the world, offering raw, cooked and cured versions of nearly everything it grows and rears. Wine's position on this crowded table is less clear. Only twenty years ago, Chianti bottles came wrapped in straw "fiascos"; the empty bottles made good lamp stands and improvised as candelabras, but the quality reminded you that the straw hat was the headgear of the beach donkey, and not the thoroughbred horse.

At the start of the 21st century, Italy is now a thoroughly modern winemaking nation; growers have taken on and beaten the bureaucrats who'd wanted to put a permanent lock on innovation, revealing a land brimming in flavour from top to bottom.

In short, Italy produces delicious wine.

NORTH AMERICA

Despite its legions of producers, for a long time Californian Chardonnays and Cabenets all did pretty much the same thing but in different sizes. The most expensive wines just tended to be deeper, darker versions of the $5 jug wines. It took inspirational figures like Paul Draper and Josh Jensen to revive California’s wine ambitions post-prohibition, and today America’s West Coast is rapidly becoming the most diverse viticultural environment in the world. Somewhere between Los Angeles and Seattle there exists the perfect habitat for every single grape variety that has ever been picked, pressed or bottled.

ALSACE

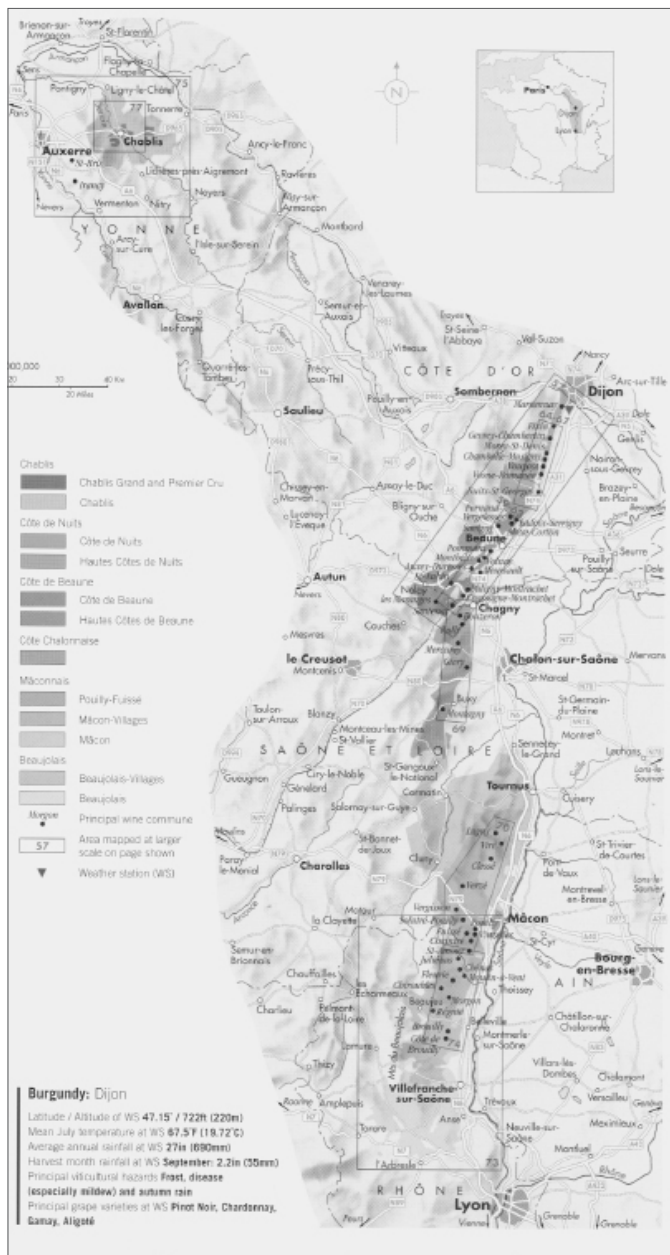

In winter the land is hard with frost and the hills are crested with snow. Through July and August however this alpine backdrop suddenly looks surreal; for two months, daytime temperatures soar, and the chlorophyll sizzles. But just as dramatically as it arrives, so the summer hurriedly departs. By late September, the first frosts have felt their way into the vineyards, and overnight the leaves turn, from their margins inwards, a papery-brown. During harvest, a thick mulch of leaf litter covers the ground.

For the vine, summer is a time of accumulation, and autumn a time of consolidation. Once the grapes have changed colour, their skins become more porous, and hot weather can all too easily evaporate flavours and aromas - not to mention precious juice - from the grapes. Hence, the early onset of the autumn helps seal-in the rapidly hoarded sugars and savours of summer, and provides Gewürztraminer with a rich and distinctive ambrosial element.

BURGUNDY

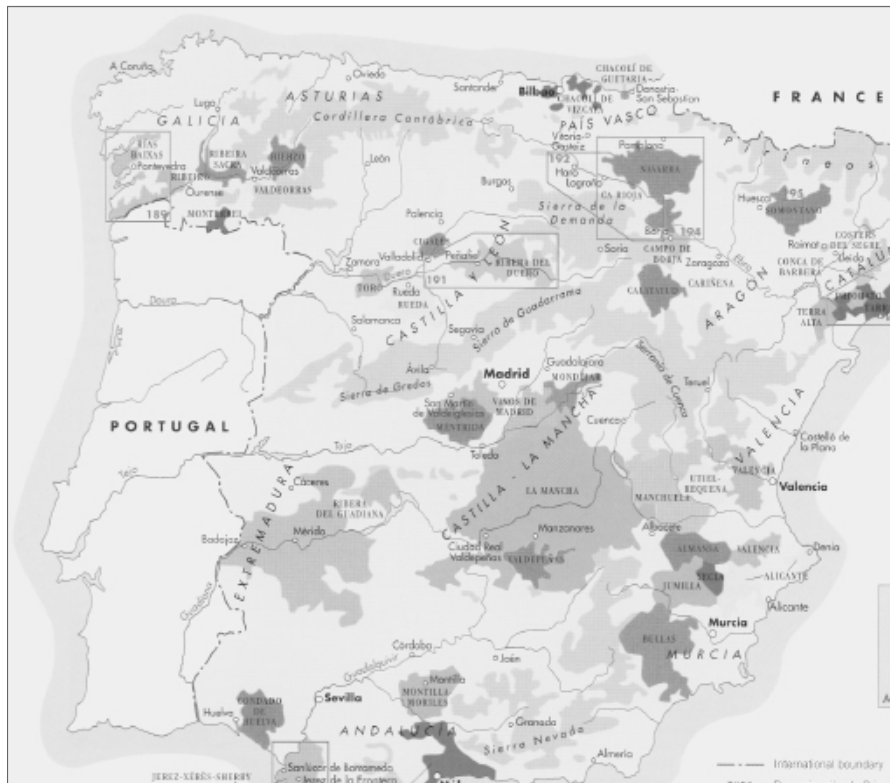

Two thousand years ago, when the Romans had a stab at globalisation, they took their vines and viniculture with them. Once in Burgundy the invaders passed up the chance to improvise with any local vines, and, as a consequence, cultivation of the local Pinot Noir did not start until after the Empire's retreat. A peculiarly French logic therefore has it that while the Romans brought viticulture to France, it was France's destiny to bring fine wine, via Pinot Noir, to the world.

Over the centuries, Burgundy yielded to a gentle legislation that saw its vineyards partitioned, a few hectares at a time, according to the quality and style of the wine they produced.

SPAIN

Spain was once synonymous with one grape variety: Tempranillo; and one wine - Rioja. The old pun about once you have seen 'Juan' you have seen them all applied to wines too. Not so today. The donkeys and mules have been retired and a young generation of wine makers are squeezing new life from Spain's old vines.

BORDEAUX

The unremarkable flatness of the Haut Médoc, contrasts with the stellar reputation of its Châteaux. Bordeaux is synonymous with the trinity of Cabernet, Merlot and Cabernet Franc, but its vineyards also donated Malbec and Carmenere to the World.

Traditionally Merlot added ballast to the cranberry bite of Cabernet, but over recent decades the variety's very own appetising mix of blackcurrants and menthol have delivered it out of Cabernet's dark shadow.

AUSTRALIA

Twenty years ago, Australian wine was the big beast sown below, with Shiraz providing the super-sized trade-up for our small-scaled tastebuds. Two decades on and much has changed.

The style of the whites has become much more nimble as winemakers have moved on from oak infused Chardonnay and Semillons, and Riesling is now in the aromatic ascendancy. The red wines too have pared down on the bland richness of the early vintages, and the flamboyant fruitiness of Shiraz is now cut through with an appetizing savoury edge.

CHAMPAGNE

The chalky hills of Champagne mark the northerly limit of French viticulture. The vineyards face north, south and east across open plains, the flat line of the horizon adding to the sense of climatic exposure that peaks during the run-in to vintage.

At 30,000 a, Champagne is a roomy appellation, but traces of Provenance become sublimated through the blending process. Originally, Dom Perignon saw blending as a pragmatic solution to the changing fortunes of vintage, but what he didn't anticipate was the energy of combination that the practice would unleash within the wine.
